

Oregonauthor.com
Jon Remmerde

Cycle of Time

First light of day
17 below zero
Fahrenheit

I step
to the front porch
to see the day

An old woman,
old-fashioned clothing
dressed as if she cared not at all
about the coldness
of the morning
pedals down the hill bright orange, green, and red old-fashioned bicycle one of those with an enormous front wheel and a small back wheel

She wears a voluminous old-fashioned dress
tones of soft gold
above black leather boots gold ribbon trails behind her
in cold morning air

front wheel
a clock
whose hands
say midnight.
back wheel
smaller clock,

whose hands
say twelve noon

Startled and cold, I call out, “What is that?”

She answers “We are the cycle of time.”
her voice trails
behind her
wisps of her breath
visible vapors

in cold air
grey light of first morning she rides
into the next minute toward the next hour
next year
eternity

evenly inexorably
as the second hand

as ice must form
on water
at seventeen below zero Fahrenheit